LGBTQ Laws Protection

In Miller Susan's article "Shocking numbers: Half of LGBTQ adults live in states where no laws ban job discrimination," it is clear that LGBTQ people undergo a tough time trying to fit in and blend with other people in society. This article, which is published in the U.S.A Today, endorses the argument that there are no succinct laws that have been developed to govern and, hence, oversee the rights of the people of different sexual orientation (Miller, 2019). Despite these people participating in several demonstrations, and debates about fighting for their rights, the government has not yet passed any precise law to protect them from being denied the privileges which people of hetero orientation have.

In the article, Miller (2019), use facts to explain how these people have undergone serious sexual discrimination. The discrimination against these people is, however, not publicly staged. It is silently practiced in different areas of life, including academic institutions, workplace, homes, and other parts of society. The LGBTQ are denied work opportunities or promotion at work; they are being treated differently at schools, a factor that causes a lot psychological problems.

Since the number of LGBTQ people who have come out has risen over the years, there appeared a need for law formulations that revolve around their welfare. The government should come up with laws through the national assembly to check their welfare and design policies that should be used by different institutions when dealing them. According to the article, it is because of the lack of structured law that LGBTQ people have undergone improper treatment over the years. With laws in place, institutions will have to follow them to the latter, and this will automatically eliminate the denial of privileges among the LGBTQ community.
